July 2017

A definitive buying guide from buying stupid shit from china

AllExpress

Aliexpress is owned by the Alibaba Group, a huge fucking online shopping and e-commerce company. Aliexpress has everything you could possibly want or need. They have almost every item you can think of. They also sell Chinese knockoffs of Aliexpress items. Chinese equivalent of eBay. Reviews on Aliexpress don't mean much as Chinese sellers can just review and people will leave 5-star reviews just for getting the item in the mail.

Taobao.com

Taobao is owned by the Alibaba Group and is basically Chinese eBay. The whole site is in Chinese and all the prices are in Chinese Yuan. Most of the time you will have to pay shipping fees to get your item from Taobao. You always have to pay for shipping. Sellers will ship you goods to a factory and you can send an agent to get the item to ship it to your country or whatever. Taobao is almost always used for weird gear or replica items.

GearBest

A relatively new (established 2014) technology-focused shopping site. Advances toward using Gearbest include their flash sales and their own forums. They also have a "Gearbest Review" section where users can post reviews so take the reviews with a grain of salt. Gearbest offers "shipping insurance" so if your item gets lost in the mail, Gearbest offers "drop shipping" which means they will sell your item to another user and then have them ship it to you. Gearbest owns warehouses in Spain, the US, Hong Kong and the EU. Typically has the lowest prices found on the internet.

eBay

Ebay was originally made for collectors and is a way for ordinary people to sell to other people. This is known as C2C selling. It's a great place to sell to people who are interested in getting something at a lower price. eBay has been very successful in getting adopted by business-to-consumer sales. Ebay isn't the best place to get the most Chinese goods at the lowest prices but it's widely used by thousands of vendors and provides a large catalogue.

DHgate.com

Digate doesn't bother removing copyrighted items so fakes are prevalent. Digate is also pretty much the bottom of the barrel for most fakes, don't expect those $30 shoes to be anywhere close to the real deal. Some higher-end replica sellers use Digate as a marketplace place but have listed or removed stores.
